IV. CONCLUSION

A. The National Academy of Sciences Report

On February 13, 2011, the National Academy of Sciences (NAS), along with the National Academy of Engineering, the Institute of Medicine, and the National Research Council, published a long-awaited report concerning the scientific procedures used by the FBI and other authorities during the seven-year investigation of the anthrax attacks.<sup>296</sup> The NAS report found that while the attack anthrax spores shared undeniable similarities with the anthrax found in Ivins' lab within the flask labeled RMR-1029, a number of possible explanations for these similarities existed, yet were not explored.<sup>297</sup> The attack spores could have evolved on their own, leading to the spores possessing characteristics akin to the RMR-1029 anthrax.<sup>298</sup> Moreover, the report stated that the RMR-1029 could not been the immediate source of the anthrax used in the letters because at least one additional "growth step" would have been required to weaponize the RMR-1029 anthrax.<sup>299</sup> While the report did not comment on the overall effectiveness of

<sup>296</sup> ignored. The report seemed to excuse the actions of investigators which were based on incomplete information. However, where science and justice unavoidably collide, should entities like the FBI be justified in utilizing incomplete information to "ferret out" suspects prior to either fully developing the evidence or eliminating other less intrusive possibilities? Finally, the NAS report recommended that the FBI conduct further review of samples gathered from overseas locations, which may have been a subtle suggestion to avoid ruling out or overlooking the possibility that the anthrax letter attacks were carried out by foreign perpetrators.<sup>297</sup>

B. Case Closed?

By issuing a 92-page report, which laid out the findings of the Amerithrax investigation and the bulk of evidence gathered against Dr. Ivins, the Justice Department closed one of the largest and most expensive investigations in the agency's history.<sup>298</sup> However, skeptics have voiced their concern regarding many

The title should accurately, completely, and specifically indicate the focus of the paper, and should contain relevant “keywords.” The best way to structure you title is to look at your hypothesis and experimental variables. EXAMPLE: Chicago Manual of Style: Table of Contents Lists of Figures and Tables This is a useful section to include because your images or tables are referred to repeatedly throughout your text. For example “Report on a case of specific developmental delay in an autistic child” can be written as “Specific Developmental Delay in Autism: A case report” Author Names and Corresponding Author Information The order in which the authors are listed can be variable. Author Affiliations The purpose of providing author affiliations is to indicate the institution(s) where the research was performed, and to provide readers with a way of contacting the authors. If a drug name is mentioned in the title, the generic name should be used unless several proprietary versions of the drug are being compared or the article is commenting on a specific proprietary version of the drug. For example, Avoid: Dept. Tip 2! In case of Japanese author names, some journals specify guidelines for formatting of author names (e.g., a comma should be placed between the author’s surname and personal name). This will also help if they are looking for something particular. An abbreviated abstract will assist the reader in finding what the main points of the report will be about. For example, if a report is written to McDonald’s, the cover page will be in yellow and red with the golden arches as a picture. The team, which comprises subject matter experts, academicians, trainers, and technical project managers, are passionate about helping researchers at all levels establish a successful career, both within and outside academia. Then list the main addresses of all the authors below the author names. In some cases, a journal’s Instructions to Authors will specify which style of title to use (e.g., descriptive or conclusive). These elements are often referred to as “Book Elements”, as they are commonly found in larger works. 1 The title page is the first page of your article, and therefore it is important to have a well-formatted title page that clearly represents your paper. Table of contents are usually extremely generic and similar to each other. Some lengthy reports may also include a table of graphs and/or a table of figures. If the report cover looks bleak and dull, the reader will start reading with a negative outlook. In our next post, we discuss in detail the elements whose inclusion is subject to the journal guidelines. Specifics such as the size of the font, font type, formatting, and organization also need to be taken into consideration when creating the front matter of your report. Executive Summary or Abstract Abstracts are an important element in the business world. There are two main ways to list affiliations. The journal usually specifies the length (word/character count) and format of the titles (Title case, middle aligned, etc.) as well. Charts and graphs that show factual data are helpful visuals that can be implemented into this section of the document. Usually, it is the only aspect of the article that appears in tables of content and in many of the databases used for literature searches. Along with the complete postal address, many journals require authors to include the phone number, a fax number, and email addresses. Tip 1! Although it is the first page of the manuscript, this section is usually written right at the end. This page should include all the information necessary for a reader to identify the contents of the article, its author(s), origin of the article, and the article type. It is also a popular platform for networking, allowing researchers to learn, share, and discuss their experiences within their network and community. Omit nonspecific openings such as “Studies of. . .” Omit ambiguous terms such as “with.” This can be replaced with specific terms such as “induced by” or “-mediated” e.g., Pulmonary changes in rats with bleomycin can be revised to “Pulmonary changes induced by bleomycin” or “Bleomycin-mediated pulmonary changes in rats” Avoid making the titles unnecessarily lengthy. Note that if an author has moved since completing the research, it is inappropriate to list their current address as the main address. For example Structure: The Effects of [Independent Variable] on [Dependent Variable] Example: Effect of cystatin C on NK and bactericidal activity Titles can be of two types: Descriptive (e.g., The effect of AB antibody on CD virus) stating the main focus of the study Conclusive (e.g., AB antibody inhibits CD virus) stating the main conclusion of the study. It will be the foundation for first impressions, for better or worse. This also allows for easy comparison between images when they are grouped together. List of Don’ts Avoid using dashes or periods to separate parts of a title. Important considerations should be made on how your publication will be used. To increase usability, you should consider how your readers will be using the report, and what they will be looking for, and focus on making this easy to find. The cover page is the first thing that is seen. Affiliations corresponding to the author names are denoted using superscript numbers/letters. Often the order of the authors denotes their contribution to the study, i.e., the first author has made the largest contribution, and the remaining authors are listed in descending order of their contribution to the study. This is for ease of navigation to the user. Please follow the one in sample papers of the target journal: List each author name with his/her affiliation below the author name For example, List all authors in one line. For example, content=a773185161~db=all For any authors who have moved to a different institution between the time that the research was performed and the manuscript is published can also provide a current address. One easy way to make the report stand out is to use a theme for the report that your audience can connect to. Covers A cover page is a very simple, precise, brief way to introduce your report to the reader. The title page contains all or a combination of the following elements. Titles should be preferably written as a phrase, but if necessary, it may be a declarative sentence or a question. Include Figures and Tables lists when your article is over about 15 pages. Check out these tips now! Article Title The title is a major determinant of whether the manuscript will be read. It should draw the reader’s attention and interest and make them want to continue reading. Front matter is an extremely important element to writing any report. Title Page A title page will be very similar to your front cover and it repeats the information on the cover, but adds more important details. This may include a report number, date, title, the names and addresses of authors, specific contract information, the name and address of the supervisor, and the name and address of the organization who supported the report (Technical Communications, p.312) The title page is an opportunity to provide specific, detailed information about the document and its authors to its intended audience. Whether its for a specific company research or for other personal reports. Tip 3! Avoid abbreviating the name of institutions/organizations. One goal of the cover page is to be informative and scalable because once it is filed, it will need to be easy to pick out of a stack of other reports. Think of the cover page of a report like what is worn to an interview. Often, summaries are used when representing a report in a database, so illustrating the main topics of your report in this segment can be useful. The abstract should always be a page or less, especially in informative situations. Always (Part 1 – discussed in this post) Article title Author names Author affiliations Corresponding author information Optional depending on Journal Guidelines (Part 2 – discussed in next post) Headers – Running title, First Author name Footnotes – Grant support, Conflict of interest (Declaration of commercial interest), Authorship, Statement of author death Keywords List of Abbreviations Miscellaneous (Word count, article type) You will find exactly what to include in the title page in the Instructions to Authors section of a journal’s homepage. The first few pages of a report are essential. This should contain: A large specific title Company name Name of the author(s) Date of the report Relevant picture The use of a relevant picture or two can help reinforce the subject of the report. Enago Academy, the knowledge arm of Enago, offers comprehensive and up-to-date resources on academic research and scholarly publishing to all levels of scholarly professionals: students, researchers, editors, publishers, and academic societies. A second goal is to make the report stand out. This will help a manager learn the main points of your document, and help the reader determine if the entire report is relevant to what they are looking for. This will be where most of the key words of your report are used, and will be a preview of the information to be covered. In addition to the summary, this will allow the reader to quickly scan the topics you have covered. That is, always provide a complete address. For example, according to the guidelines of American Journal of Botany, the following need to be included: Title, Author names, Author affiliations (See Related: Wondering how to make your research stand out from the rest? Sometimes the senior author (responsible for overseeing the entire project— study and manuscript preparation) is listed last. Another style, which is no longer very common, is to list the authors alphabetically. It is important that the reader believes that he or she is the most important aspect of the report. Avoid using abbreviations in titles, since the non-standard abbreviations might be confusing to the readers not familiar to the subject. Use of proper headings and sub-headings give readers a good overview of all the information contained in your document. The corresponding author’s address is usually listed as a footnote to the list of authors. Table of contents can be formatted from Microsoft Word. of Biotech., NUO Use: Department of Biotechnology, National University of Osaka Corresponding Author Information One author is always chosen as the “Corresponding Author.” All correspondences from the journal will be directed to the corresponding author, who is then responsible for keeping the other authors updated with regard to the status of the manuscript. According to the Technical Communications text, Identify the intended audience Describe Contents Tell the reader how the information is presented Table of Contents In any report or analysis, a table of contents is helpful to navigating the report. Major topics should be mentioned, but not the main points of each. Cases in which superscripts need not be used to indicate correspondence Single author papers When all the authors are from the same affiliation However, this depends on the journal guidelines as well. Keep it concise. Typically an abstract should not be more than 15 percent of the total report.
